Short and Long Street Dresses. Gail Hamilton writes in Harper's Bazar:

"Fly swiftly round, ye wheels of time, and bring the day when society shall have settled upon some general street dross, simple, graceful, convenient and unchanging, and shall leave to individual taste only choice of material, color and subordidate details. Then you shall not have to alter except to fresher. Then you shall be pointed or rounded or squared according to your liking, and shall say so. Then ing to your liking, and shall stay so. Then you shall not spend your time in pulling off last year's satin, or your money in putting on this year's velvet, but satin—to borrow Punch's wit—shall be sat in till it
